Migration in Ghana

- Migration has long been an enduring feature of the life narratives of many people in Ghana.

- Pre-colonial migration associated with factors including wars, trade, colonization of new lands and slavery (Boahen, 1975; Anarfi, et al., 2003).

- Colonial recruitment and development policies re-shaped the migration dynamics in Ghana.

- These policies led to immigration of some foreign nationals, mainly Africans but also Europeans, into the country.

1960 population census of Ghana: migrants accounted for 12 percent of the enumerated population; many of them (98%) West Africans (Anarfi, et al., 2000; Anarfi, et al., 2003). Ghana as migrant recipient country

Mass out migration in Ghana 1980s (political, economic and educational reasons).

In 1983, Ghanaians constituted 81 percent of all ECOWAS nationals legally resident in Nigeria (Adepoju, 1988)

Migrant HTAs in Ghana

- Migrant HTAs in Ghana created through migrant social networks (Tonah, 2005a; Antwi Bosiakoh, 2008)

- In Ghana, migrant HTAs existed during colonial times, but the post independence period provides better understanding of these associations (Busia, 1950; Acquah 1958; Little 1965).

- Migrant HTAs serve as fellowship platform for migrants, help in finding jobs and housing and have a focus on hometown development (Acquah, 1958). They also maintain and reinforce ethnic identities and hometown loyalty (Little, 1965).

- Formed mainly around larger units (ethnic groups, district or administrative regions of origin).
However, with increased population, they fragment into smaller village, town, professional or even social groupings (Little, 1965; Tonah, 2005a; Obeng, 2010).

Asante, Kwahu, Nzima, Frafra, Bono or even Northerners are typical examples (Tonah, 2005a).

Membership sizes vary greatly between larger and smaller associations.
Nigerian migrant associations in Northern Ghana (Eades, 1994), Mainly Traders

Town unions or the Parapo: four main towns, Ogbomosho, Igboho, Shaki and Igbetti. Membership of all but Igbetti was restricted to married men. Membership size ranged from 83 for Shaki parapo, the smallest, to 170 for the Ogbomosho parapo, the largest. Parapo were governed by an executive body (chairman- alaga, secretary- akowe and treasurer- akapo together with their deputies. They held regular meetings.

Religious organizations (churches and mosque): Eades accounts on the Yoruba migrants in Tamale suggest that, two-thirds were Muslims and the remainder Christians. Muslims worshiped in the Sabon Gida mosque or the Hausa Zongo mosque. A Koranic school specifically for Yoruba children in Sabon Gida established in late 1960s; mainstream population of 250, and evening class population of 180.
Many recognized Yoruba mallams were also in Tamale providing all manner of services (divination, ritual, amulets and prayer) for the migrants and Ghanaians.

Of about 12 churches in Tamale at the time, 3 had almost exclusively, Yoruba congregations. The First Baptist Church, the largest had a membership of about 400, the United Missionary Church had a membership of about 200, all from – Igbetti, and the Second Baptist Church had membership of about 100, was made up of Yoruba migrants from Ogbomosho, Igboho, Ilesha and Shepeteri.

There were similarities in the organization of all the three Yoruba churches in Tamale. Most congregation members belonged to some sort of society (egbe).
Royal Ambassadors (boys and young men), Women’s Missionary Union (married women), Girls’ Auxiliaries (girls) and Egbe Lydia (young educated unmarried women).

The Yoruba Community Committee (Ilu Pejo): brought together representatives of all Yoruba towns with migrants in Tamale. Started with informal meetings and developed into a formal organization with its own officials and representatives from the Yoruba towns with migrants in Tamale. 16 Yoruba towns were represented.

Ilu Pejo focused mainly on disputes between members from different towns as those between people from the same town were handled by town parapo. Ilu Pejo also sent delegations to different events and activities in town.
The Nigerian Community Committee: served as a between Nigerians in Tamale and its environs and the Nigerian High Commission in Accra. It was created as an attempt to coordinate the activities of the various groupings in the area. Initially, the NCC consisted of members of the three largest Nigerian ethnic groups – Hausa, Yoruba and Igbo. When in 1969 the Ghanaian government asked missions of foreign governments in the country to issue their nationals with passports, the Nigerian High Commission registered Nigerians nationals through the NCC.
The Oboman Kuo: It is an umbrella association for the people of Obo (a rural community in the Eastern Region of Ghana) who have migrated to Accra and Tema mainly for trade. It is a domestic migrant association, formed in the 1960s and serves to coordinate a number of smaller associations (Obo Humble Ladies, Kakyire Youngsters, Friends of Presby, Adehyemma Fun Club, Obo Youth Association and Obo Biakoye). Membership is about 500.

Since its formation, Oboman Kuo initiated development projects including: the Kwahu Water Project, construction of a 48 shed market, community centre, renovation of the girls’ dormitory of secondary school and re-roofing of the community clinic, initiation of efforts to establish tertiary educational institution in Obo, provision of street lights, paving of some access roads and establishment of scholarship scheme for brilliant but needy students.
The Bantari (Tonah, 2005), Cattle herders

- The Bantari: Fulani ethnic association in Wungu, northern Ghana. Formed in 1992, with 2005 membership size of 25, the association is organized around the survival and expansion of cattle herd.

- It has executive body, and regular meetings times but with no written constitution. The association provides financial and material support to members.

- In recent times, Bantari has been involved with conflict resolution in Wungu and its environs.
Since 2008, my research has focused on three Nigerian migrant associations in Accra, namely the Nigerian Women association, the Nigerian Committee of Brothers association, and the Edo State association.

In terms of membership, they fall into ethnic (the Edo), national (the Nigerian Women) and a semblance of brotherhood or charity (the Nigerian committee of Brothers) associations.

The associations were formed to maintain ties and provide assistance to each other.

They have durable organizational structures and well defined tenures of leadership.
New migrants show higher leaning to the associations, but leadership responsibilities are mostly entrusted in the hands of older migrants.

Migrant associations and migrant integration in Ghana

Although migrant integration is a task by individual migrants, increasingly, the role of migrant associations is becoming important. As Acquah (1958) has observed, migrant associations are created to provide integrative and supportive environment for new arrivals. For this reason we explore the integration role of the associations discussed.

- The existence of the Yoruba associations allowed new migrants to enter into ready-made social networks on their arrival in Tamale.

- They also served as friendship networks within which migrants spent much of their time, and also received support for personal, family and other problems.

- Cases of marriage between Yoruba migrants and Ghanaians were also observed by Eades (1994:160).
In the case of Bantari, members were helped as individuals and families to find a community, Wungu; achieved economic stability and self-sufficiency through jobs provided by Alhaji Iddrisu Mahamadu, the president and his relations; and learnt the new social and political system of Wungu and Ghana in the process.

For Oboman, it provided its members a platform for uniting natives of Obo in Accra/Tema as a measure to ward off individualism and the lack of belongingness that characterise urban life.

The Edo Association helps members deal with the problems they encounter with immigration officials.
Migrant associations and migrant integration in Ghana, cont’d

- The Nigerian Committee of Brothers Association takes interest in the initial settling problems its members encounter (eg. Accommodation). Also, participation in association activities stimulates civic participation.

- The associations also serve as vital sources of financial assistance for taking care of medical cost, as well as housing and accommodation problems.

- Members are encouraged to show pride in their culture by expressing, promoting, and preserving their traditional songs and dances as well as dresses and foods.

- The unity and confidence brought by these cultural activities help the associations and their members to mobilize resources and pool their energies together to deal with the challenges they face in Ghana.
Cattle herding, the economic activity of Bantari members, comes with a lot of risks (bad weather and climatic conditions and high rate of loss of livestock to disease and livestock rustlers).

When these happen, Bantari provides both financial and material supports to such members ‘to bring them back to their feet’.

‘Livestock may be loaned out to members’, and for new arrivals, the association ... assists them to locate Mamprusi cattle owners searching for hired herdsmen. In other cases, the association helps establish contact with cattle traders (Tonah, 2005a:268).

Bantari also mediates and actually resolves farmer-herder conflicts between its members and farmers within and around the Wungu area.
As traders, Nigerian migrants in Ghana came into conflict with the law/authorities. Here membership in parapo or any of the associations became important (Eades, 1994; Antwi Bosiakoh, 2009a):

Senior members had links with the police and other officials and could intercede on the member’s behalf. If a member was arrested, one of the big men would be contacted and he would set off to the police station to try and settle the matter’ (Eades, 1994: 145).

The Ilu Pejo also intervened and reached agreement on market stall charges for its members. Meetings of Ilu Pejo also discussed issues pertaining to the trade activities of its members. Eades reports that, for these meetings, women were made to attend.
When Nigerian migrants in Accra get into trouble with the Ghanaian Ports, Customs and Police officials (which occurred from time to time), some of cases end up in law courts.

In these situations, the associations offer assistance by intervening to find a solution on behalf of the troubled member. In many cases the associations attempt finding legal counsel for the member.

These intervention acts help members in their economic activities and ‘...remain outstanding, unmatched by any other activity’.
Migrant associations and the negotiation of labour market conditions in Ghana, cont’d

- The Nigerian Committee of Brothers intends establishing a transportation business to generate funds for other projects and also to offer employment to some of its members.

- The Nigerian Women Association also hopes to set up a viable economic venture to provide jobs for some of its members (Antwi Bosiakoh, 2009a)

All of these intentions, when materialized, would also come to add to the way and manner the associations aid their members to participate in the Ghanaian labour market.
Summary/Conclusion

The major pre-occupation of this paper has been to discuss the role of migrant associations in migrant integration and the negotiation of labour market conditions in Ghana.

In doing so, the paper first provides brief history of migration in Ghana, and discusses the emergence of migrant associations in the migration process.

Different dimensions of different migrant associations in Ghana have been discussed. Two specific highlights have been made, namely how the associations help their members integrate into Ghana through the activities, programmes and services they provide for them, and how the associations help their members to participate in the Ghanaian labour market.
